Tortured by guilt and responsibility after the death of their young son, Anne-Sophie and Bernard each confront the tragedy in their own way. In order to regain her emotional balance, Anne-Sophie escapes from everything that reminds her of her son. With nothing but a few clothes, she decides to move to the city, where she is hoping to start a new life. Bernard’s life stays the same as he tries to keep everything as it was before. Despite their separation, both try to uncover who is really to blame for the tragic event.

Tension grows between the couple with time and the distance... Is the loss of their son too shattering or is there still hope for them to overcome it?

How do you find your light when darkness falls?
